- A. The government determines what and how much is produced and consumed.
- B. Firms and households rarely interact in the marketplace.
- C. Open competition between self-interested sellers advertising to self-interested buyers adversely affects product availability.
- D. The role of information is negligible with regard to buying decisions.
- E. People and firms pursue their own goals.

People and firms pursue their own goals. By nature, people are acquisitive. They always want more—for less. Open competition between self-interested sellers marketing to self-interested buyers naturally leads to greater product availability at more competitive prices.

During the 19th century, wholesalers controlled the marketing process because they distributed the manufacturers' unbranded commodity products. When those markets became saturated, though, the wholesalers started playing one manufacturer off against another. This hurt manufacturers' profits dramatically, so they started looking for ways to wrest back control. The manufacturers changed their focus from a production orientation to a marketing orientation. They dedicated themselves to new product development, strengthened their own sales forces, packaged and branded their products, and engaged in heavy national brand advertising.

Beginning around 1980, the postindustrial age has been a period of cataclysmic change. Citizens became increasingly aware of the sensitive environment in which we live and alarmed by our dependence on vital natural resources. Acute energy shortages of the 1970s and 1980s introduced a new marketing term, demarketing. Producers of energy and energy-consuming goods used advertising to slow the demand for their products. Ads asked people to refrain from operating washers and dryers during the day when the demand for electricity peaked.

Essay Questions

92. Describe the four fundamental assumptions of free-market economics.

A market economy is characterized by four assumptions: (1) Self-interest: People and firms pursue their own goals. By nature, people are acquisitive. They always want more—for less. Open competition between self-interested sellers advertising to self-interested buyers naturally leads to greater product availability at more competitive prices. (2) Complete information: Buyers make better decisions when they have more information about the products they can choose from. Sellers can also more efficiently find consumers of their goods by providing information about what they sell. (3) Many buyers and sellers: Having many sellers ensures that if one does not meet customer needs, another will capitalize on the situation by producing a better product. Similarly, a wide range of buyers ensures that sellers can find customers interested in the unique products they are able to produce at a fair price. (4) Absence of externalities (social costs): Sometimes the sale or consumption products may benefit or harm other people who are not involved in the transaction and didn't pay for the product. In these cases, government may use taxation and/or regulation to compensate for or eliminate the externalities.

94. Write a short note on the significant events of the preindustrial age that contributed to the development of modern advertising.

During the preindustrial age, several important events contributed to the eventual development of modern advertising. The Chinese invented paper and Europe had its first paper mill by 1275. Around 1439, Johannes Gutenberg invented the printing press in Germany. Some entrepreneurs bought printing presses, mounted them in wagons, and traveled from town to town selling printing. This new technology made possible the early instances of advertising—posters, handbills, and signs—and, eventually, the first mass medium—the newspaper.

In 1472, the first ad in English appeared: a handbill tacked on church doors in London announcing a prayer book for sale. Two hundred years later the first newspaper ad was published, offering a reward for the return of 12 stolen horses. Soon newspapers carried ads for coffee, chocolate, tea, real estate, medicines, and even personal ads. These early ads were still directed to a very limited number of people: the customers of the coffeehouses where most newspapers were read.

Samuel Johnson, a famous English literary figure, observed in 1758 that advertisements were now so numerous that they were "negligently perused" and that it had become necessary to gain attention "by magnificence of promise." This was the beginning of puffery in advertising. In the colonies, the Boston Newsletter began carrying ads in 1704. About 25 years later, Benjamin Franklin, the father of advertising art, made ads more readable by using large headlines and considerable white space. In fact, Franklin was the first American known to use illustrations in ads.

During the 1800s, manufacturers were principally concerned with production. The burden of marketing fell on wholesalers, who used advertising primarily as an information vehicle. Montgomery Ward and Sears Roebuck produced the earliest catalogs, bringing a wide variety of products to new, rural markets. Only a few innovative manufacturers (mostly of patent medicines, soaps, tobacco products, and canned foods) foresaw the usefulness of mass media advertising to stimulate consumer demand.

In the context of the evolution of advertising in America, describe the significant events of the industrial age.

The industrial age started during the second half of the 19th century and lasted well into the 20th. Ads were created prior to the industrial age, but it was not until this period that it can be said that an advertising industry existed anywhere in the world. It was a period marked by tremendous growth and maturation of the country's industrial base.

During the 1800s, manufacturers were principally concerned with production. The burden of marketing fell on wholesalers, who used advertising primarily as an information vehicle. Ads appeared in publications called price currents that informed retailers about the sources of supply and shipping schedules for commodities.

The American profession of advertising began when Volney B. Palmer set up business in Philadelphia in 1841.

In 1869, Francis Ayer formed an ad agency in Philadelphia and named it after his father. N. W. Ayer & Sons was the first agency to charge a commission based on the "net cost of space" and the first to conduct a formal market survey.

The telegraph, telephone, typewriter, phonograph, and, later, motion pictures all let people communicate as never before.

With the advent of public schooling, the nation reached an unparalleled 90 percent literacy rate. Manufacturers gained a large reading public that could understand print ads. The United States thus entered the 20th century as a great industrial state with a national marketing system propelled by advertising. With the end of World War I, the modern period in advertising emerged.

The manufacturers changed their focus from a production orientation to a marketing orientation. They dedicated themselves to new product development, strengthened their own sales forces, packaged and branded their products, and engaged in heavy national brand advertising.

In the 1920s, the era of salesmanship had arrived and its bible was Scientific Advertising, written by the legendary copywriter Claude Hopkins at Albert Lasker's agency, Lord & Thomas. Radio was born at about the same time and rapidly became a powerful new advertising medium.

On October 29, 1929, the stock market crashed, the Great Depression began, and advertising expenditures plummeted. In the face of declining sales and corporate budget cutting, the advertising industry needed to improve its effectiveness. It turned to research. Daniel Starch, A. C. Nielsen, and George Gallup founded research groups to study consumer attitudes and preferences. By providing information on public opinion, the performance of ad messages, and sales of advertised products, these companies started the marketing research industry.

Manufacturers followed this strategy of product differentiation vigorously, seeking to portray their brands as different from and better than the competition by offering consumers quality, variety, and convenience.

98. What is meant by the USP of a product? Why did American advertisers introduce the idea during the "Golden Age" of advertising?

Rosser Reeves of the Ted Bates Agency introduced the idea that every ad must point out the product's USP (unique selling proposition). The USP refers to product features that differentiate it from competitive products. It was an extension of the product differentiation strategy. The USP was a logical extension of the Lasker and Hopkins "reason why" credo.

99. List the two economic factors that best characterize the marketing world during the postindustrial age.

The two factors that best characterize the marketing world during the postindustrial age are: (1) the aging of traditional products, with a corresponding growth in competition, and (2) the growing affluence and sophistication of the consuming public, led by the huge baby boomer generation.

The most important factor was competition, intensified by lower trade barriers and growing international trade. As high profits lured imitators into the marketplace, each offering the most attractive product features at lower cost, consumers benefited from more choices, higher quality, and lower prices.

On the demand side, newly affluent consumers concerned themselves more with the quality of their lives. With their basic commodity needs already met, baby boomers were interested in saving time and money to spend on leisure-time activities or on products, services, and social causes that represented their aspirations.

100. Explain the following statement: "As a social force, advertising has been a major factor in improving the standard of living in the United States."

By publicizing the material, social, and cultural opportunities of a free enterprise society, advertising has increased productivity in both management and labor.

Advertising serves other social needs besides simply stimulating sales. Free media are not really "free"; newspapers must pay for paper, ink, and energy, and radio stations require equipment, buildings, and towers. All media organizations must pay salaries and benefits for reporters, engineers, and management. Newspapers, magazines, radio, television, and many Web sites all receive their primary income from advertising. This facilitates freedom of the press and promotes more complete information.

Some advertising organizations also foster growth and understanding of important social issues and causes through public service. The Red Cross, United Way, and other noncommercial organizations receive continuous financial support and volunteer assistance due in large part to the power of advertising.
