13. One way to maximize communication in the succession process is to create a family council.

(p. 40)

TRUE

One way to maximize communication in the succession process is to create a family council. A family council includes family members with immediate interests in the business (spouse, sisters and brothers, older children, etc.). The focus of council meetings is the business-family relationship. The meetings can also be a good forum for grappling with issues like role expectations, commitment, and personal responsibility.

The ability or skill of the entrepreneur at finding expendable components necessary to the operation of the business such as time, information, location, financing, raw materials, and expertise is known as resource competencies. Resources lead to specific resource competencies. For even the smallest part-time business, the entrepreneur needs to find or gain access to resources such as time, information, financing, space for the business, raw materials, and a variety of people (advisers, suppliers, service providers, customers).

60. Martin runs a successful house painting business. He runs his business out of his garage, which (p. 35) he got converted into an office space. Martin, who had previously worked as a house painter in another company had good know-how of how to run a house-painting business. After a storm destroyed public properties in his neighboring town, he contracted with the mayor of that town to fulfill any painting jobs required during the town's reconstruction. In order to meet this demand and expand business, he hired more house painters.

According to the BRIE model, which of the following is an example of Martin's basic business competency?

- A. Martin hiring more house painters to meet demand
- B. Martin contracting with the mayor to help paint during reconstruction
- C. Martin getting his company registered
- D. Martin having prior knowledge of the house-painting business

The competency suggested by boundary relates to the organizational and business processes of a firm. This type of expertise can be called basic business competency. There are certain fundamental activities that all businesses must perform, which are called the key business functions, and include sales, operations (also called production), accounting, finance, and human resources. Getting organized and registered—which creates the boundary—is an example of an operations activity.

The entrepreneurs' goals in starting the business might also play a role. For example men more often mention making money as a motivation, while women more often mention having flexibility for personal and family life. The overall growth strategies also differ, with more women choosing single-person lifestyle firms over the small business forms that employ others. A problem for second career entrepreneurs is keeping personal finances out of the business. Often when individuals are laid off or given early retirement, they can receive lump-sum financial settlements. Frequently, people intending to become late career entrepreneurs plan to use a substantial portion of these funds to start the new business. They fail to carefully consider how they will invest the money in the business, and how it will be used. Essay Questions

92. Define the five Ps of entrepreneurial behavior.

(p. 30-32)

There are five aspects of behavior that most successful entrepreneurs display. The five behaviors include the following:

Passion: Passion is an intense positive feeling the entrepreneur has toward the business or even the idea behind the business. It comes from being actively involved in moving the business forward.

Perseverance: Perseverance is best thought of as a type of learned optimism, the ability to stick with some activity even when it takes a long time, and when a successful or unsuccessful outcome is not immediately known.

Promotion/Prevention Focus: Most of us have some mix of two internal focuses (also called our regulatory focus), a promotion focus intent on maximizing gains, which gives us a bias toward pursuing opportunities likely to lead to those gains, and a prevention focus intent on minimizing losses, with a bias toward inaction or protective action.

Planning Style: There is more than one way to plan. In fact, there are five ways. These include different types of planners like comprehensive planners, critical-point planners, opportunistic planners, reactive planners, and habit-based planners.

Professionalization: The extent to which a firm meets or exceeds the standard business practices for its industry is known as professionalization. One hallmark of successful entrepreneurs is that they usually do at least one thing much better than average.

(p. 31-

Critical-point planners plan around the most important aspect of the business first, act on it, and then consider if additional plans are needed. It is not a very long-term approach to planning. Reactive planners are completely passive, waiting for cues from the environment to determine what actions to take. Their focus is entirely short term, and there is little in the way of goals driving their efforts. They can make the most of a situation because there is no other plan competing for their attention.

95. Outline methods or techniques for time management.

(p. 38-
39)

The organizing process to help make the most efficient use of the day is known as time management. There are a collection of techniques for time management, which can help meet the challenges of schedule overload. Consider these basic methods:

List—Whether you use a pad of paper, a specialized form like a Franklin Planner, a PDA, or Microsoft Outlook's Task function, the key to staying on top of your responsibilities is to list them as soon as you get them. Then as you finish them, you can enjoy crossing them off the list.

123 Prioritize—As you look at your list, prioritize your tasks based on their importance to your business and their due date. The most important tasks due soonest get a priority of 1. Tasks with lesser importance or a longer time to completion get ranked 2, and your "back burner" concerns get ranked 3. If there are tasks (of any level) that can be lumped together, so much the better. How do you decide importance? If the task will not help your business or family, it is probably not a priority 1 task.

Delegate—Look at your task list and see which tasks you can get others to do for you (for free or at a price). When you're overloaded, getting more people on the job for you is a powerful way to get more done.

Repeat—Take a few minutes every day to repeat the above steps. It will save you time later.

Strategize—Once a week, take a few minutes to look at the things you didn't do this week and check if you are overlooking something which could be important to your business, family, or yourself, but is getting overlooked in the short run. Entrepreneurs are notorious for overlooking their health and cheating themselves and their businesses out of time to think about the big picture and their firm's future. Ten minutes a week spent this way can make a world of difference.

96. Discuss the challenge of succession faced by family businesses.

(p. 39-
40)

When the current owners are ready to think about who follows them, it involves thinking about succession—the process of intergenerational transfer of a business. Often the lack of a clear succession plan is the death knell for those family firms facing their first intergenerational transition. If the founder dies, becomes seriously ill, or is incapacitated before he or she can groom a successor, the new family leader may be suddenly thrust into the role before coming up to speed on vital company information and developing needed skills. Also, in the absence of a succession plan, private and public dissension among various factions of the family becomes more likely, negatively affecting operations within the firm, and may eventually cause the business to fail. Succession plans deal with the people who will take over, what roles they will fill, and what supports they will receive. Problems arise when there are no successors available within the family. Only a very small number of all entrepreneurs were able to rely on family members to take over. Sometimes none of the children have an interest in the family business. The opposite problem arises in situations when several family members believe they should take over the top spot and vie for the position to the detriment of both family and business. The owners of a family business tend to be especially passionate about their enterprise, because they have a huge economic incentive to pay very close attention.

97. What are the challenges faced by team entrepreneurs?

(p. 40-41)

While the classic image of the entrepreneurial small business would involve the image of the solo entrepreneur, the modern reality is different. The majority of new businesses have a team of two or more co-owners, and the trend is toward even more businesses being developed by teams of entrepreneurs. When putting a team together it is important to work out key issues ahead of time. For example, team members might be putting different amounts of money or time into the business, but might be expecting identical returns, which creates an equity problem. A team can also face conflict over idea ownership, shared goals and how to make decisions, especially when the team is evenly split on choices.

98. Describe the challenges faced by women and minorities in small businesses.

(p. 42-
43)

Women-owned businesses are one of the fastest growing sectors of all U.S. businesses.

Between 1997 and 2012, the number of private businesses with at least 51 percent female ownership increased by 54 percent, while the rate for firms overall was 37 percent.

Representing approximately 22 percent of all U.S. businesses, the number of minority-owned firms has likewise grown explosively in recent years.

Despite the growth in the number of women and minority entrepreneurs, both groups still face the challenge of access. Access refers to the simplest form of discrimination—often women- or minority-owned firms are simply excluded from the opportunities offered to firms owned by white males. This can result from the way that networks built from interpersonal relations in business exclude women and minorities. When business relationships build from shared hobbies, sports, or even college ties, social situations that are all male or largely white outside of work can lead to unintegrated business networks.

Access problems for women- and minority-owned small businesses crop up most often as discrimination in financing. This means that they may not be given the same access to funds or contracting opportunities that white male-owned firms are given.

99. How can the problems facing women-owned and minority-owned firms be solved?

(p. 43-
44)

The major challenge facing women-owned and minority-owned businesses is gaining access to opportunity.

There are two solutions for access-based challenges. One solution is institutional, when minority- and women-owned small businesses pursue dedicated contracting funds, known as set-asides, among big companies and government agencies. Governments at all levels have special contracting opportunities for small businesses that are owned and operated by minorities or women. Qualification for set-asides requires certification as a business owned and operated by a woman or a minority (or both). For corporations, certification is handled by organizations that are not affiliated with the government or big business. Certification consists of proving that the business is truly owned and operated by a woman or minority. A similar process is used by the U.S. government, with the Small Business Administration certifying firms for the SBA's 8(a) Business Development Program. Certification is not for every women- or minority-owned small business. The small business needs to put more energy and resources into record keeping than it might otherwise do, especially businesses that opt for minimalized or specialized levels of professionalization. For those businesses that qualify, certification provides a ready means of access to opportunity and to networks of businesses and government agencies which can be leveraged to gain access to other sectors of business. The second approach to solving problems of access is personal and involves making extra efforts to network. Building a social network is central to business success. For minority-owned and women-owned businesses, networking is especially important because such firms need to network even more than other types of firms. While networking with other minority-owned or women-owned firms will feel comfortable, and lead to business within that group, the real gains in business require networking in more diverse and potentially less comfortable situations. Success comes from the number of different types of contacts one makes, and for a minority-or women-owned business, this requires having business contacts from other races, genders, ages, and sectors.

100. Who are referred to as the second career entrepreneurs?

(p. 44)

A special group of entrepreneurs are called second career or late career entrepreneurs—people who begin their businesses after having retired or resigned from work in corporations at age 50 or later. Whether these individuals start their business as part of a postretirement career plan or after early retirement has forced them to reevaluate their lives, a late career as a business owner has become a necessity for them. As increasing numbers of corporations merge, downsize, reorganize, and/or close altogether, many firms are offering attractive retirement packages to encourage employees to voluntarily leave the organization. Workers are opting to accept generous offers to retire early (between ages 50 and 64). People's decisions of whether to return to work depend on their individual level of wealth (retirement income and savings), their health, and their work experience, as well as general economic conditions. About a third of the retirees who return to work decide to become self-employed.

101. Explain the challenges faced by second career entrepreneurs?

(p. 44-45)

About a third of retirees who return to work decide to become self-employed. There are three main challenges for such entrepreneurs—adjusting to the entrepreneurial life, reestablishing self-confidence, and keeping personal finances out of the business.

Working for others for most of their life, late career entrepreneurs are likely to have gotten used to having many of the daily chores of running a business done for them. Even for former managers, the mechanics of getting the location cleaned or the payroll checks written may have been things they could take for granted. As entrepreneurs, they have to do these things themselves or arrange to have them done. All entrepreneurs get used to a do-it-yourself approach, and this is a challenge for everyone, but it can be especially trying for late career entrepreneurs, who may have hoped that life would get easier rather than harder later in their careers.

The second challenge comes from a loss of confidence. The stigma attached to older workers' departure from their former job can make a tremendous difference in their level of confidence. Being given early retirement can be seen as a company's effort to replace expensive (if capable) older talent with junior people who work for less. But being laid off or downsized suggests that the person was expendable at best. The difference in labeling makes a difference in the late career entrepreneur's self-confidence.

The third problem is keeping personal finances out of the business. Often when individuals are laid off or given early retirement, they can receive lump-sum financial settlements.

Frequently, people intending to become late career entrepreneurs plan to use a substantial portion of these funds to start the new business. Sometimes this happens because late career entrepreneurs see their personal funds as "easy money." Many people who take the easy money are also taking the easy way out. They fail to carefully consider how they will invest the money in the business, and how it will be used. Taking the easy way out can often mean late career entrepreneurs are underprepared for the rigors of business, and they are risking their retirement nest egg.
