41. What is the basic philosophy behind problem-oriented policing?

- a. Rather than dealing with repetitive calls for service at the same locations or with the same subjects and treating them as separate incidents to be handled before clearing the calls and going on to other calls, problem-oriented policing focuses attention on the underlying difficulties that create patterns of incidents (Goldstein, 1979). It allows officers to take a holistic approach, working with other citizens and other agency representatives to find more permanent solutions to a variety of police problems.

42. The Era of Social Upheaval during the 1960s and 1970s was noted to appear as though the notions of family, church, and the police were “losing their grip on society.” To what extent is this true today?

a. Currently some have argued that both in the United States and around the world, there is a “war on Christianity,” as evidenced by the passage of ObamaCare that included mandatory health care coverage of birth control, the elimination of prayer in schools, and controversy over the phrase “In God We Trust” on United States currency and in many courtrooms. The passage of marriage equality legislation has also upset many of these same individuals, who contend that the term “marriage” should be reserved for the legal and religious union between a man and a woman, thus challenging the traditional notions of family. Last, the police have been under heavy criticism for the excessive use of force, as seen in numerous cases, a recent example of which is one that took the life of a six-year-old boy in Louisiana. Thus yes, given the current social and political context, it could easily be argued that the notions of family, church, and the police are once again “losing their grip” on society and do not possess the same amount of political or social power as these institutions did a few short years ago.

43. What is “intelligence-based policing”?

a. Intelligence-based policing is a policing model that originated in Britain and focuses on risk assessment and risk management. This approach involves identifying risks or patterns associated with groups, individuals, and locations in order to predict when and where crime is likely to occur. Many agencies now conduct crime analyses on a regular basis, thus identifying reported crime patterns. An effective records management system allows front-line officers to easily obtain this information on a timely basis prior to or while responding to a call. This may assist officers in proactively identifying and anticipating problems likely to be encountered rather than reacting to them at the scene.

44. What is the Commission on Accreditation for Law Enforcement Agencies (CALEA)?

a. CALEA is the accreditation organization for all law enforcement agencies in the United States. It was formed through the efforts of the International Chiefs of Police Association, the National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives, the National Sheriffs Association, and the Police Executive Research Forum. The commission became operational in 1983 and has been granting accreditation since that time. By 2012, one quarter of law enforcement officers in the United States worked for agencies that have CALEA accreditation. Many agencies originally accredited have now been through the reaccreditation process, and numerous agencies are awaiting either accreditation or reaccreditation.

45. What has been the trend of community policing?

a. Many police departments have given higher prioritization to homeland security planning, which has resulted in fewer officers devoted solely to community policing and smaller or static departmental budgets. Police departments that place greater emphasis on community policing are more likely to have a website, to exhibit greater transparency in the display of data, and to provide more opportunities for citizen input. Not all observers of the police see a continuing role for community policing. While some argue that community policing has taken a backseat to other policing strategies, it continues to play an important role behind the scenes. Many of the more recent strategies in policing could not be effective without strong police–community partnerships.
